Yawu Miller, senior editor at the Bay State Banner, which covers Boston's black community, reports he was the subject of a field interrogation and observation (FIO), also known as "stop and frisk", by Boston Police officers at Roxbury District Court today:

Miller tweeted, "I was at Rox.

District Court, shooting photos. As I left, I was approached by about 7 BPD officers. They FIOed me! 1st time in more than 20 years! I thought the gray hair disqualified me. Apparently not!"

A report on this FIO now goes into a Boston Police Department database.

WGBH News reported in June that, according to data collected by the Boston Police Department, "seventy percent of people stopped by Boston Police officers through the department's 'Field Interrogation and Observation' program throughout most of last year were black — even though black residents comprise less than one quarter of the city's population."

Miller adds:

"Now 70.0001 percent of BPD FIOs are black folk! All you young folk who get jacked by the Gang Unit: I feel you."

Cinquecento Won't Be Reopening

Cinquecento on Harrison Avenue announced it won't be reopening:

"Cinquecento was many of our most beloved restaurants. We leave Cinquecento with the fondest of memories as we look back at the wedding celebrations, holiday parties, many a baby and wedding shower, a relaxing dinner on the patio and a refreshing drink at the Rosso Container Bar. We appreciate all of our loyal guests, hard working and dedicated staff, that made Cinquecento such a great restaurant. We are currently keeping your favorite Cinquecento Classics alive at Gaslight Brasserie so if you need a Bolognese fix, it is there for you!"

On April 14, a BWSC water main under Harrison Avenue burst, filling the restaurant's basement with five feet of water and turning the street and a nearby parking lot into a temporary lake.

Pine Street Inn Secures New Temporary Housing to Continue Social Distancing

SUBMITTED BY PINE STREET INN

Pine Street Inn, New England's largest homeless services organization, will move 180 residents out of temporary housing at a Suffolk University dormitory and into a building at 891 Massachusetts Avenue, Boston, to conform with the CDC's social distance recommendations, helping ensure the continued safety and wellbeing of its guests.

In March, Pine Street worked with the Boston Public Health Commission and City of Boston to move men and women from its main shelter buildings into temporary housing at a Suffolk University dorm to reduce congestion and increase social distancing. The dorm was a short-term solution, and following an intensive search to secure longer-term accommodations, Pine Street Inn will lease the space at 891 Massachusetts Avenue as a "bridge" to permanent housing, beginning July 2020. Each of the building's 90 rooms will house two guests, primarily frail and vulnerable men and women with underlying medical conditions.

"Pine Street's goal has been to move men and women off the streets, out of shelter and into permanent housing, and the COVID pandemic has made this even more urgent. We cannot go back to our pre-COVID conditions, with overcrowded shelters," said Lyndia Downie, president and executive director of Pine Street Inn. "Depopulating shelters along with other measures, including masks and handwashing, have made an overwhelming difference as we

ASK DOG LADY

Advice on Pets, Life, Love

BY MONICA COLLINS

Dear Dog Lady,

Do you have any advice for dog step-parents like me? When I fell in love with Bob, I had no choice but love his dog, a shepherd-mix named Aynsley. Bob and I got married and we all live together as man and man and dog. But Aynsley is much more Bob's dog. He immediately jumps to Bob's commands. On walks, he will always look around to see where Bob is. I often joke that even if I stood next to Bob shaking a slab of juicy meat, the dog would always go to Bob first. Why is this? Is there any way to teach an old dog to love me too? — Paul

Dear Paul,

Your question strikes a chord with anyone who falls in love with someone who loved a dog first. The simple answer is "no." Nothing personal, though. Bob's bond with

Dog Lady

Aynsley was sealed before you entered their lives and the link is unassailable – at least in Aynsley's dogged brain.

But consider this: You can enjoy all the benefits of being friends with a dog without bearing all the responsibility for the dog. Surely, you can see the goodness of this.

Dear Dog Lady,

My landlord has been watching somebody's dog for a couple of weeks. He ties the dog right outside my window during the day and leaves it there. The dog barks at everyone who walks by. I feel so badly about this. At least I get to go to work every day but the poor dog doesn't seem to go anywhere. How would you suggest I approach the landlord about this situation?

—Chaya

Dear Chaya,

Geez, Dog Lady became incensed while reading this. How anyone can just tie up a dog and expect the animal to be cool about the confinement is crazy. Step up and say something to your landlord. What? Start from the humane point of view: "I don't think it is kind treatment to keep an animal tied up all day . . ."

If he pushes back, you have all sorts of methods at your disposal: Shame him on social media (TikTok, although haters will label you a "Karen"). Call your town's Animal Control office and anonymously report him; or withhold rent because the dog disturbs your right to quiet and peaceful enjoyment of the premises.

Dear Dog Lady,

I have been so good to my dog. I never hit her, shout at her, or make her go hungry. But I swear she plots revenge on me all the time. She chews my shoes and goes to the bathroom in my closet. She looks at me like she's terribly guilty. Without sticking her nose in her messes and swatting her, how do I let her know she's done wrong? She's almost seven-years-old and she should know better.

—Melissa

Dear Chaya,

Are you talking about your dog or a bad roommate? You have fallen into that trap of anthropomorphizing your dog. Anthropomorphize is a big word for a simple concept. Anthropomorphizing occurs when someone ascribes human qualities to living creatures of another species; in this case, canines.

Dogs do not have emotions like humans. You cannot expect a dog to feel guilt, love, remorse or any feeling on a human scale. You are good to your dog, which is excellent. However, do not expect the dog to feel grateful or to consider your feelings when she goes potty in your closet.

Wiehl was a Fox News legal analyst for 15 years and a reporter/legal analyst for NBC News and NPR's All Things Considered, before that. She has come out with her second historical thriller in The Hunting Series, titled "Hunting the Unabomber: The FBI, Ted Kaczynski, and the Capture of America's Most Notorious Domestic Terrorist".

The first in the series, "Hunting Charles Manson", co-written with Caitlin Rother, was based on a re-examination of the 50-year-old case with new interviews, reviews of original source materials and dozens of parole hearing transcripts.

Wiehl, a former Federal prosecutor, relied on those same research methods to take a fresh look at the search for Theodore Kaczynski, an effort rife with inter-agency law enforcement conflicts that was almost shut down by the 150-member FBI team on the case before a stroke of luck led to the arrest of the criminally insane math prodigy. By that time, Kaczynski had killed three people and maimed more than a dozen others with bombs sent in the mail to random individuals.

Guest Opinion

How Sprawl May Kill Us

BY MICHAEL GROVE

The export of American culture is still one of the most influential forces in our interconnected world. Our pop music, movies, and artery-clogging cuisine is ubiquitous. From Dakar to Delhi, you can eat your Auntie Anne's pretzel while grooving along to Arianna Grande on your way to see the latest release of the Avengers. One of our most damaging exports, however, is our adoration of the American suburb. When our 20th century model for housing the swelling populations of Long Island and suburban Los Angeles translates to 21st century Kinshasa and Kuala Lumpur, our esteemed American way of life may very well be our own downfall. In our pre-pandemic ignorance, most urbanists pointed to climate change as the most dangerous impact of our cherished suburban lifestyle. To be sure, the higher carbon emissions and the rise in chronic health problems associated with living in subdivisions aren't going away, but COVID-19 has exposed another threat we've chosen to ignore. The next pandemic may very well result from our addiction to - and exportation of - sprawl.

The increasing traction of the anti-density movement in the wake of the current outbreak is alarming. Headlines proclaiming that residents of tall buildings are more likely to contract COVID-19, and that the initial risk of exposure in cities is greater is true, but density isn't the root of the problem. Cities aren't at fault. Global sprawl into sensitive habitats is the problem. Cities, in fact, are the answer. The more densely we build, the more land we can conserve for nature to thrive and the more space we leave untouched where viruses can naturally exist while remaining separated from humanity. Habitat destruction and biodiversity loss doesn't only occur only when we cut down tropical rainforests. Degraded habitats of any kind can create conditions for many different types of viruses to occur, whether in Accra or Austin. COVID-19 is not the first disease to crossover from animal to human populations, but it is likely a harbinger of more mass pandemics and further disruptions to the global economy.

The U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) notes that approximately 75% of emerging infectious diseases in humans are zoonotic, meaning that they are transmitted to us through contact with animals. The initial emergence of many of these zoonotic diseases have been tracked to the parts of the world with the greatest biodiversity, both in the traditional and man-made sense. Traditional locations include tropical rainforests where biodiversity naturally occurs. Human-influenced conditions include places like bushmeat markets in Africa or the wet markets of Asia, where we are unnaturally mixing trapped exotic animals with humans, often in astonishingly unsanitary conditions. When we assault the wild places that harbor so much biodiversity in the relentless pursuit of development, we are disregarding a significant aspect of this biodiversity—the unseen domain of undocumented viruses and pathogens. Natural ecosystems are not what pose the threat—the human activity that disrupts these systems, like suburban development, is the real culprit.

Moving out of dense cities into the open space and social distancing afforded by the suburbs is exactly the type of knee-jerk reaction that we must avoid. The disruption of pristine forests due to logging, mining, urbanization, and population growth is bringing us closer to species with which we have rarely had contact. By infringing on their habitats, we are reducing the natural barriers between humans and host species, creating ideal conditions for diseases to spread. This unsettling idea is already evident in the fragmented forests of many American suburbs, where development patterns have altered the natural cycle of the pathogen that causes Lyme disease. When humans live in close proximity to these disrupted ecosystems, they are more likely to get bitten by a tick carrying the Lyme bacteria. When biodiversity is reduced, these diluted systems allow for species like rodents and bats—some of the most likely to promote the transmission of pathogens—to thrive. This essentially means that the more habitats we disturb, the more danger we are in by tapping into various virus reservoirs.

When it comes to where the next virus might emerge, Wuhan isn't really that different from Washington DC. When the American model of over-indulgent suburban sprawl is the benchmark for success, we all will eventually lose. Now is the moment to put the health of the planet before our American values of heaven on a half-acre. Our land use policies in this country have just as profound an impact on the rest of the world as any movie out of Hollywood. If we shift American values toward embracing denser, cleaner, more efficient and well-planned cities that drive ecological conservation, instead of promoting sprawl as a panacea for our current predicament, that may very well be our greatest export to humanity.

Michael Grove is the Chair of Landscape Architecture, Civil Engineering, and Ecology at Sasaki, a global design firm with offices in Boston and Shanghai.

HOMELESS SERVICES AND HOSPITAL CAPACITY

On April 2nd, Mayor Walsh announced that construction begins at the Boston Convention and Exhibition Center to add 500 beds for treating homeless adults who have tested positive for COVID-19 and need care, but do not require full hospitalization.

The City has released a Request for Proposals to secure a partner organization to operate the facility. If necessary, the Convention Center beds will be opened up for hospitals to use for sub-acute COVID patients in the general population.

These 500 beds will bring Boston's total number of new beds for homeless individuals to over 1,000. This includes Boston Medical Center's Newton Pavilion facility, which the City and State are working to re-purpose as a medical facility for homeless residents affected by the coronavirus.

SMALL BUSINESS SUPPORT

On April 2nd, Mayor Walsh announced two new resources that will help small businesses during the public health crisis.

The City of Boston has created a Small Business Relief Fund. Drawing on a combination of City, federal, and private industry contributions, it establishes $2 million in grant funding—capable of providing a lifeline to hundreds of local businesses at risk of shutting down permanently due to the crisis. It will be administered as a streamlined version of the City's Small Business Financing program. Small businesses can begin applying on Monday, April 6.

The City of Boston has also created a Financial Relief Handbook and FAQ document for small businesses. It's a resource for navigating both public and private capital programs. It puts information and guidance about all the different programs together in one place.
