United South End Settlements (USES) was formally recognized as a historic site during a Feb. 27 ceremony in the organization's courtyard at 36 Rutland St.

The unveiling, hosted by Embrace Boston and United South End Settlements, marked USES' inclusion in the citywide Everyone250 initiative, which commemorates historically significant sites ahead of the nation's 250th anniversary.

A temporary historical marker was presented recognizing USES as a South End community anchor since its founding in 1892 and honoring its decades of service to families and individuals from all backgrounds.

Speakers at the event included

Family Fault Lines Take Center Stage in "We Had a World"

BY JULES BECKER

Is a play always personal for its author? In a recent chat between Huntington artistic director Lorretta Greco and playwright Josh Harmon, the dramatist observed, "Not every play is a personal excavation of something—but since it comes from you, it will always be personal." In various ways, Harmon lived up to this comment in his earlier "Prayer for the French Republic" (also staged by Huntington). Now Huntington is presenting the regional premiere of his latest and most personal play "We Had a World." Harmon has described this autobiographical portrait as an

The Women Who Made the South End Great

Maria Louise Baldwin. Public domain photo, via Wikimedia Commons.

If you want to understand what made, and makes, Boston's South End one of the most remarkable neighborhoods in America, forget the Victorian brownstones for a minute. Look at the women.

The Boston Women's Heritage Trail's South End walk documents some truly extraordinary people — activists, artists, educators, and organizers who didn't wait for the world to catch up. Most of them still don't get the credit they deserve.

Start with Maria Louise Baldwin. In 1889, she became the first African American female principal in Massachusetts and the Northeast, running a school in Cambridge where the faculty and nearly all the students were white, including the children of Harvard professors. W.E.B. Du Bois said she had achieved the greatest distinction in education of any African American not working in segregated schools. Worth noting: the Cambridge school system initially refused to hire her. The Black community had to protest just to get her in the door. Then in 1916 she was named Master of the school, one of only two women in Cambridge to hold that title, and the only African American in all of New England.

Two milestones, 27 years apart. She earned both of them.

Then there's Melnea Cass. You've certainly driven Melnea Cass Boulevard through Roxbury. Did you know she was known as the "First Lady of Roxbury"? Cass spent more than six decades fighting for educational and economic opportunities for Boston's Black community. She started organizing Black women to register to vote the same year the 19th Amendment passed. She co-founded Freedom House. She launched one of Boston's first pre-K programs. She served as NAACP chapter president. When she died in 1978, more than a thousand people showed up — Black and white, rich and poor, young and old.

Mary Evans Wilson started the Women's Service Club during World War I, and also helped build Boston's NAACP chapter, creating an organized infrastructure for Black women's leadership.

Education reformer Wilhelmina Marguerita Crosson was teaching Black history decades before anyone else. And Anna Bobbitt Gardner became the first African American woman to earn a bachelor's degree from the New England Conservatory in 1932. She then ran music studios in Boston for over 60 years, produced radio and TV programming, and organized "Colored American Nights" featuring Black musicians at Symphony Hall.

Two sculptors you should know. Meta Vaux Warrick Fuller was a Harlem Renaissance artist who gained international recognition for work that took on race and identity head-on. And Fern Cunningham created "Step on Board," the Harriet Tubman memorial in the South End, installed in 1999. It was the first statue honoring a woman on city-owned land in Boston.

Frieda Garcia ran United South End Settlements for years, focused on literacy, affordable housing, and youth programs. And Myrna Vázquez, the woman Casa Myrna is named for, was one of the earliest and loudest voices against domestic violence and for Latino civic empowerment in this city, at a time when neither issue was getting the institutional attention it needed.

And then there's Kip Tiernan. Tiernan was a lesbian who lived in the South End, and the Boston Women's Heritage Trail walk literally starts near her home. On Easter Sunday 1974, she opened Rosie's Place in an abandoned supermarket on Columbus Avenue, the first shelter for homeless women anywhere in America. She'd seen women disguising themselves as men just to get a bed for the night, and she decided that was unacceptable. So she fixed it, with $250 and four volunteers. She also co-founded the Greater Boston Food Bank, Boston Health Care for the Homeless, and about a dozen other organizations. When she died in 2011, Mayor Tom Menino said there was "a big hole in our lives." USA Today named her a Woman of the Century. The trail starts at her doorstep for a reason.

The trail also includes poet Louise Imogen Guiney and archaeologist Harriet Boyd Hawes.

These are just some of them. There are more. Visit The Boston Women's Heritage: www.bwht.org/explore.

South End Stoop Sessions Spotlights Joanne Chang in Latest Episode

BY SOUTH END NEWS STAFF

A new neighborhood podcast is focusing on the business owners, artists and residents who help define the South End.

Episode 2 of South End Stoop Sessions features a conversation with acclaimed chef and restaurateur Joanne Chang, founder of Flour Bakery + Café, as she marks 25 years in the South End.

The podcast, available on major streaming platforms, airs every other Thursday and focuses on informal, in-depth conversations with shop owners, artists, entrepreneurs and longtime neighbors. The goal, according to the show's description, is to highlight the voices that make the community "come alive."

In the latest episode, Chang reflects on opening Flour's first location in 2000, when the South End was still in transition. She discusses the early challenges of building a business, growing alongside her team and navigating national attention — including what it was like when the FoodNetwork came knocking.

Chang, a James Beard Award winner, has expanded Flour to multiple locations across Boston and Cambridge, but her roots remain in the South End, where the original bakery helped define a wave of neighborhood dining growth in the early 2000s.

South End Stoop Sessions is available on Spotify, Apple Podcasts and other major platforms.

NEWS FROM... ST. BOTOLPH NEIGHBORHOOD ASSOCIATION

The St. Botolph Neighborhood Association (SBNA) will hold its Spring Community Meeting on Wednesday, April 8, from 6:30 to 8:30 p.m. at Union Church, 485 Columbus Ave.

The meeting will bring residents together with local elected officials to discuss neighborhood priorities and community updates. It will also mark the start of a new SBNA board term for 2026–28 following the organization's recent election process.

SBNA is also preparing to celebrate its 60th anniversary this year. Organizers are developing a neighborhood history series highlighting the association's role in preserving and shaping the area over the past six decades. Additional details are expected in the coming weeks.

Recent community activities included a March 5 walking tour hosted by the Friends of Titus Sparrow Park to the Urban Park Roof Garden in Kendall Square, as well as SBNA's ongoing first-Tuesday monthly meetups, which take place in both morning and evening sessions to accommodate residents' schedules.

Residents interested in learning more about SBNA membership, upcoming events, or neighborhood initiatives can visit the association's website for updates.

Theater

"honest version of a memory play." Under Keira Fromm's strong direction, this alternately serious and humorous play brings the world of Harmon's family—specifically his grandmother Renee, his mother Ellen and himself Joshua—to vivid life on the Wimberly Theatre stage at the Calderwood Pavillion.

As the play begins, strong-willed Renee urges Joshua to make his latest effort "as bitter and vitriolic as possible" and turn it into a kind of "Virginia Woolf?" Part 2 by way of "Medea." At times, the bitterness and vitriol become what the play describes as a 'Battle of the Titans' namely between Joshua's mother and grandmother.

In some ways, Joshua's challenge becomes tantamount to a Herculean labor as he tries to bring understanding between them even as he determines to find the truth of their conflict and their individual influences on him and his personal odyssey. In the process, the playwright makes both women as memorable and distinctive as his journey to understanding himself as well as his relationship to them.

That journey begins very early on as his culture-loving grandmother introduces him to artistic work that his mother considers inappropriate—for example the Kevin Costner film "Dances with Wolves" at age seven and the controversial Mapplethorpe art exhibit at age nine. Renee even has Joshua read the tough Greek classic "Medea" at age 10 and follow up actually seeing a production of the play starring Diana Rigg. Not surprisingly, Joshua suggests that his grandmother "changed my life."

By contrast, Ellen takes a more emotionally conflicted view of Renee. Revealing to Joshua that his grandmother is an alcoholic even as she admits to talking with her mother six times a day, she warns her son to never drink in front of her. Ellen's ongoing bitterness involves having to cope with Renee's parental failings—notably waiting for her no-show drunken mother while fellow classmates shared a school tea with their own mothers. She also speaks with deep resentment about a 2003 Rosh Hashanah blowout and a Passover disaster at which Ellen bothers to bring her own matzoh ball soup and Tupperware items only to take them away after cantankerous Renee actually hits her and inexcusably accuses Ellen of abuse.

Joshua, attempting to find common ground between them, continues to look for positive factors even as he candidly but kindly suggests that his own mother see a therapist and finds ways to counter his grandmother's more unpredictable statements.

The Huntington cast members capture all of the complexities informing the three characters. Amy Resnick finds all of Renee's indomitable spirit and convincingly moves from secure body language to a struggling gait as she reaches old age. At the same time, her ongoing warmth with Joshua as she influences him is fully arresting. Eva Kaminsky smartly handles the tricky role of Ellen, capturing her periodic outbursts with her mother and always catching her very real concern for Joshua. She reaches a fine moment of pathos as she confesses to experiencing a tortured existence for sixty years.

Will Conard has all of the appealing openness and unflagging optimism of Joshua (the play's persona for playwright Harmon). He artfully balances Joshua's occasional frustrations in trying to understand the conflict between his mother and grandmother with his sense of serenity in speaking about Nick, a psychiatrist who is bringing him happiness. Courtney O'Neill's scenic design easily finds the emotional expansiveness of the play in its variety of set pieces, particularly an elegant loveseat at stage right that the grandmother has kept all to herself.

At one moment of appreciation, grandmother Renee (whom Joshua affectionately calls Nana) expresses the feeling that wherever Joshua is, she just wants to say thanks. Audiences should embrace Harmon's wonderfully reflective play and Huntington's first-rate staging with equal gratitude.
