The Boston City Council has ordered a hearing to examine enforcement of the city's "space saver" policy after complaints that residents continued reserving parking spots long after recent snowstorms ended.

Councilor Miniard Culpepper, whose district includes parts of the South End, introduced the hearing order during a March 11 council meeting, citing widespread violations of the city's 48-hour rule. The policy allows residents to reserve cleared on-street parking spaces for a limited time after a snow emergency is lifted. Space savers are not allowed at any time in the South End and Bay Village.

The Council adopted the order and referred it to the Committee on City Services and Innovation Technology, chaired by Councilor Ed Flynn. As of Tuesday, no hearing date had been announced.

Residents city-wide have complained that some left space savers

A sure sign of spring in the South End: street sweeping is back—starting this week after a snowstorm delay, and, as always, getting an earlier start here than in most Boston neighborhoods.

That means parking rules are back in effect. If your car is on the wrong side of the street, you may come back to a clean curb... and no car. Vehicles can

South End Baseball Registration Open for Spring Season

Registration is now open for South End Baseball's 2026 spring season, offering youth baseball and T-ball programs for children in the South End and surrounding neighborhoods.

The nonprofit league provides programs for a range of age groups, from beginner T-ball players to more experienced youth teams, with a focus on skill development, teamwork and community participation. Games and practices are typically held at local fields, including Peters Park.

South End Baseball is a volunteer-driven organization that aims to make the sport accessible and inclusive, welcoming players of all experience levels.

Families are encouraged to register early, as teams fill quickly ahead of the spring season.

March 4 — Snow Cleanup Complaints Raise Accessibility Concerns

Residents raised concerns at a City Council hearing about snow removal, citing blocked sidewalks and accessibility challenges for seniors and people with disabilities. City officials acknowledged the complaints as part of ongoing discussions about winter response.

March 9 — New Liquor Licenses Approved in South End

Several South End restaurants are among the latest businesses approved for new liquor licenses by the Boston Licensing Board, according to the city.

The approvals include all-alcohol licenses for Agosto and Baby Sister, Bey, and Nan Xiang Express, as well as a beer and wine license for Perch. The licenses are part of a broader effort to expand access following recent state legislation adding new permits citywide.

March 10 — Large Fight Leads to Firearm Arrest in Roxbury

Boston police arrested one person on firearm-related charges after responding to a large fight involving dozens of people on Washington Street in Roxbury, according to police.

March 16 — Mayor Skips St. Patrick's Day Breakfast Amid Tensions

Mayor Michelle Wu did not attend the annual South Boston St. Patrick's Day breakfast (hosted by Sen. Nick Collins) where disputes over Boston's property tax policies took center stage. The debate has highlighted ongoing tensions between City Hall and state lawmakers.

March 16 — Parade Draws Crowds, Arrests

Boston police made at least 17 arrests during this year's St. Patrick's Day parade in South Boston, part of a large public safety response to one of the city's biggest annual events, according to police and local reports.

'Love Your Block' Cleanups Set for May 2 in South End and Across Boston

Boston's annual "Love Your Block" neighborhood cleanup initiative will return this spring, with local events scheduled for Saturday, May 2, including sites in the South End.

Organized by the city's Office of Civic Organizing, the program invites residents, community groups and volunteers to take part in neighborhood cleanups aimed at improving streets, parks and public spaces.

Participants can either join an existing cleanup site or organize their own. City officials encourage groups to register early, as supplies and support are distributed on a rolling basis. Cleanup tools will be available for pickup at designated neighborhood locations on the morning of the event and must be returned later that day.

The initiative, formerly known as Boston Shines, has grown into a citywide effort drawing thousands of volunteers each year. In 2025, more than 3,000 participants worked at over 150 cleanup sites across Boston.

Registration for both site organizers and volunteers opened March 10. Individuals and small groups without a designated site can sign up to be matched with a local cleanup.

Police Tow Scooters in South End Enforcement Operation

Boston police towed a dozen scooters and mopeds during a targeted enforcement operation in the South End and nearby neighborhoods earlier this month, citing ongoing safety concerns.
 Officers from District D-4, which includes the South End, along with the department’s Auto Theft Unit, conducted the initiative — known as “Operation Safe Scooter” — on March 9 and 10, according to the Boston Police Department.
 The operation focused on busy corridors including Boylston Street, Huntington Avenue and surrounding areas, where police say they have received complaints about unsafe and illegal scooter use.

 Police said 12 scooters and mopeds were towed for violations of motor vehicle laws, and one operator was issued a summons for driving with a suspended license.
 The enforcement effort follows concerns about scooters operating illegally on sidewalks and in bike lanes, as well as the use of unregistered vehicles, according to police and local reporting.
 Police said the department will continue to conduct enforcement operations across the city.

Antiquities

Alex Lonati's smooth direction, nine talented and versatile actors take on a variety of roles, both human and digital, in a strong production of this provocative Pulitzer Prize finalist.

As the play opens, two curators invite the audience, at once Calderwood theatergoers and post-human visitors, to tour a series of exhibits numbered by year, from 1816 through 2240, in what Harrison calls the Museum of Late Human Antiquities. Exhibit 1816 serves as a frame for what follows, as Mary Shelley, her husband Percy, Lord Byron, Claire Clairmont, and physician Thomas Briggs engage in a storytelling contest that leads to Shelley's Frankenstein. From there, the audience moves through exhibits that together form an archaeological portrait of the so-called Late Human era, as interpreted by digital entities.

All nine actors move convincingly from exhibit to exhibit, portraying both famous figures and ordinary people. Allison Russo captures Mary Shelley's sense of wonder and her embrace of life's complexities. Jesse Hinson conveys Percy's chauvinistic posture, while Tobias Wilson brings elegance and playfulness to Byron. Kelsey Fonise gives Claire warmth and maternal instinct, and John Kuntz brings understated confidence to Dr. Briggs. Helen Hy-Yuen Swanson shows determination as a lawyer negotiating for an employee in Exhibit 2023. Anderson Stinson III portrays the insecurity and hope of Stuart, a lonely inventor celebrating his self-learning robot in Exhibit 1978. Catia is effective as a granddaughter explaining the internet in Exhibit 2008. Seventh grader Harry Baker is especially impressive, particularly as the thoughtful Noah in Exhibit 1987.

In her playbill note, Lonati acknowledges that the "unknown and unregulated nature of AI" may be troubling to many theatergoers. At the same time, she finds comfort in the uniqueness of humanity. Harrison's play leaves those questions open, but Speak Easy's timely staging makes a compelling case for its relevance.

Wait Until Dark

bending take on "Dial M for Murder." Now producing artistic director Weylin Symes is bringing similar theatrical light to the classic Frederick Knott play "Wait Until Dark" (as adapted by Jeffrey Hatcher). The exciting result is not only another company triumph in the thriller genre but also further evidence that GBSC favorite Paul Melendy ("Featherbaby") is a talent with terrific range.

Film buffs familiar with the Audrey Hepburn movie version will realize that Melendy is playing the villain Roat (and all of his incarnations) that Alan Arkin made so scary. This critic remembers a tour of the play in which Marisa Tomei portrayed the blind heroine Susan (Hepburn in the movie) effectively, but talented director Quentin Tarantino proved totally unscary as Roat. Melendy is quickly proving as adept at sinister roles as comical ones. Throughout his portrayal wisely balances understated menace and outright sadism as Roat and his accomplices search for a doll containing drugs.

Equally important, of course, is the persuasiveness of the actress playing

Susan. Jenny S. Lee (who is alternating with Eliza Barmakian through the run) establishes from the start that Susan is determined to command as much independence as possible despite her sight challenge. That determination is clearly illustrated during a kind of test that Susan employs—involving her apartment—to make sure that young neighbor Gloria is not only reliable but fully trustworthy. Lee wisely captures Susan's tenacity as well as her vulnerability as she deals with the pivotal doll and the dangerous people searching for it.

The actors playing Roat's criminal colleagues catch all of their characters' distinctive personalities. Veteran actor Bill Mootos — sporting a large hat and overcoat (kudos to costume designer Deirdre Gerrard) — has all of Carlino's energy pretending to be a policeman investigating the murder of a victim found in Susan's apartment. Mamadou Toure properly presents mysterious Mike as a supposed buddy of Susan's husband Sam and brings a measure of pathos to his character as a man regrettably caught up in Roat's deadly plans. There is even an interesting moment when Toure moves closer to Lee's Susan as she happens to touch his uniform — suggesting that he may feel some attraction to her. Amalia Tonogbanua has all of Gloria's spunkiness as well as her need for validation (given the fact that her mother invites men to their upstairs apartment and her father has left his family). Thain Bertin captures photographer husband Sam's caring for Susan.

Crucial to the atmosphere and suspense of "Wait Until Dark" is a strong combination of lighting and sound. Jeff Adelberg, a master lighting designer ("The Dybbuk") brings rich fulfillment to the title of the play and Susan's ability to deal with her adversaries as she eliminates almost all of the lighting in her apartment. Particularly striking is Adelberg's use of vivid red lighting at the time an unseen truck is running down one of the accomplices. Caroline Eng provides fine accompanying sound here as well as during the final standoff between Susan and Roat.

Early on, Susan wonders why she has to be "the world's champion blind woman." Knott's play — in Hatcher's satisfying adaptation — brings convincing proof of Susan's inner dignity and total integrity as a woman. Do not miss GBSC's luminous production of "Wait Until Dark."

in place two weeks after the snow had cleared, raising concerns about fairness, enforcement and public safety. Culpepper said the goal of the proposed hearing is to review how the policy is applied and whether changes are needed.

Universal Hub reported that the hearing would focus on identifying practical ways to enforce existing rules more consistently across neighborhoods. Disputes over parking spaces have also raised safety concerns in some areas.

The debate reflects a broader divide across Boston. Some residents defend space savers as a long-standing winter practice, while others argue they effectively privatize public streets and create inequities.

The South End, where space savers are already prohibited, has been cited in recent coverage as a potential model for stricter citywide enforcement.

The push for a hearing comes amid wider scrutiny of Boston's winter response. Earlier this month, residents raised concerns during a separate City Council hearing about snow removal, including blocked sidewalks and accessibility issues.

City officials have not indicated when the space saver hearing will be scheduled, but councilors say they want to address the issue before the next winter season.

If your car does get towed, you can find it by calling the Boston Police tow line at 617-343-4629 or searching online at boston.gov/towed-vehicles.

Cleaning Tips for Residents:

Give your sidewalk a quick sweep or rinse before your street is cleaned

- Push winter sand and debris into the street on your scheduled day
- Loosen any packed buildup along the curb so sweepers can collect it more easily

- And the big one: move your car. Those sweepers can't do much with a line of parked cars in the way.

Check posted signs for your street's schedule — and consider it your annual reminder that Boston has officially entered mud season.
