DaRosa Seeks Legal Path Back to Mayor's Race Following Kraft Withdrawal

BY SOUTH END NEWS STAFF

A razor-thin margin in last week's Boston preliminary election for District 7 City Council may trigger an official recount.

Mavrick Afonso, who finished third in the 11-candidate race, announced Monday that he plans to request a recount with Boston's election department. According to unofficial results, only 17 votes separate Afonso from second-place finisher Rev. Miniard Culpepper, with the margin narrowing as additional ballots were processed after election day.

The top two finishers advance to November's general election to replace former councilor Tania Fernandes Anderson, who was recently sentenced to prison on federal corruption charges.

District 7 encompasses parts of

Hurley School Set to Receive New Playground by 2026

BY SOUTH END STAFF

The Hurley School community is rallying support for a major playground renovation project expected to be completed in 2026. The Neighborhood Parents for the Hurley School (NPHS) is partnering with Boston Public Schools to design and construct the new facility while working to secure grants and private funding.

The current playground, which has served the school for over three decades, faces significant safety and accessibility challenges. Portions of the play area have been cordoned off due to sinkholes and drainage problems, while equipment like the zipline has fallen into disrepair. The planned renovation will incorporate modern sensory and accessible elements to better serve all students.

Beyond addressing safety concerns, NPHS hopes the upgraded playground will strengthen community engagement by attracting Parenting can be just as demanding for a father as for a mother. Fans of the late great Robin Williams will fondly remember his touching portrayal of an earnest father in the 1993 hit movie "Mrs. Doubtfire." While Williams displayed his signature comic brilliance as father Daniel Hilliard, who disguised himself as the title nanny to take care of his own three children, the movie proved affecting in demonstrating his deep caring. This combination of comedy and insight should be as essential to a musical version of the film. Unfortunately, the 2019 show—on Broadway in 2021—seems to overdo the comic factors so much that the resulting effort—with music and lyrics by Wayne Kirkpatrick and Karey Kirkpatrick and book by Karey Kirkpatrick and John O'Farrell—often sacrifices custody of the ultimate

PROJECT PROPONENT: Tenants Development Corporation

151 Lenox Street is an approximately 4,692 square foot vacant parcel known as Parcel 22A located in Roxbury. The Parcel is currently licensed by the BPDA to the nearby People's Baptist Church for parking and now tentatively designated to Tenants Development Corporation ("TDC"). The site was historically occupied by residential and commercial properties (a hotel, carpenter shop, miscellaneous storage). TDC proposes a 38 unit senior, all affordable LIHTC development. The development is proposed as 7 stories, with two elevators, and 31,805 gsf with a façade which will blend into the surrounding community. The first floor will include a lobby, mailroom, common community room with a warming kitchen, a laundry room, a bike room, and a management office. Roxbury, Dorchester, the South End, and the Fenway across six wards. State law requires Afonso to collect 50 signatures from each ward by 5 p.m. Monday to proceed with the recount request.

By Monday afternoon, Afonso reported gathering sufficient signatures in four wards with help from former rival candidates Said Abdikarim, WaWa Bell, and Samuel Hurtado. The collaboration emerged due to the extremely close results throughout the field - Hurtado trails Afonso by 25 votes, while Abdikarim trails Hurtado by just 3 votes.

Said "Coach" Ahmed won the preliminary with 1,155 votes, 53 more than Culpepper.

Afonso, currently on leave from his position as director of external affairs at the state's Executive Office of Housing and Livable Communities, emphasized that the recount push stems from the narrow margins rather than allegations of voting irregularities. He views the candidates' cooperation as a potential model for future civic engagement in District 7.

The general election will be held in November, with the winner taking office in January.

Third-Place Mayoral Candidate Seeks Spot on November Ballot

Community activist Domingos DaRosa is attempting to rejoin Boston's mayoral race following Josh Kraft's withdrawal from the campaign.

DaRosa is invoking a lesser-known state law that allows the third-place finisher from a preliminary election to advance to the November ballot when one of the top two finalists drops out.

However, the process involves complex legal requirements that DaRosa must navigate to secure his place in the general election.

The activist finished third in Boston's preliminary election but was initially eliminated when only the top two vote-getters traditionally advance to the final round.

Details about the specific legal procedures and DaRosa's strategy remain unclear as the situation continues to develop.

Eight Candidates Advance to At-Large City Council Race

Boston voters will choose from eight candidates for four at-large City Council seats in the November 4 general election.

All four current at-large councilors secured spots on the ballot, led by Ruthzee Louijeune, who received the most votes in last week's preliminary election. Julia Mejia placed second, followed by Erin Murphy in third and Henry Santana in fourth.

Four challengers also advanced to November's election. Frank Baker, a former District 3 City Councilor, is seeking an at-large seat after his district council tenure. Alexandra E. Valdez, who directs Boston's Office of Cultural Affairs, earned a spot on the ballot along with small business owner and Jamaica Plain Neighborhood Council member Marvin Dee Mathelier.

Will Onuoha, an assistant general counsel for the Boston Water and Sewer Commission, rounds out the field of candidates.

The top four vote-getters in November will serve four-year terms representing the entire city on the Boston City Council.

balance that made the film so memorable.

Clearly Daniel means to show that he deserves to be an integral part of his children's upbringing—as illustrated by a winning song in the early going entitled "I Want to Be There." Craig Allen Smith—who took over the title role during the tour - brings conviction to the father's determination in this winning number as well as in reflective moments at various points in the show. Smith, an effective performer, brings satisfying phrasing to his singing and smoothly captures the quick change between father and so-called Scottish Doubtfire. Strangely, the creators of the musical often overdo hilarious moments with sequences at odds with Daniel's struggles as well as the development of the well-known plot.

Original producer Kevin McCollum was known to have spoken of the plot as "tailored for Broadway audiences." There is nothing wrong with inserting such updating elements as computers and Wi-Fi in a 2021 adaptation, but this musical version seems to suggest that modern day audiences are willing to sacrifice believability to a preference for silliness and incongruity. For instance, an ensemble of chefs complete with appropriate white outfits and hats materialize as Daniel—Mrs. Doubtfire attempts to concoct a meal from recipes on a tablet. Later, Daniel seems plagued by a nightmare vision of eight broom-brandishing Mrs. Doubtfires. Neither sequence proves truly witty or even inspired.

Elsewhere the writers have curiously decided to make mother Miranda's boyfriend a fitness entrepreneur who has commissioned her to provide fashions for the line he is introducing. Inexplicably, Mrs. Doubtfire replaces a missing model in the company's dancing sequence and makes an equally surprising appearance at a following brief workout session that has no real connection to what preceded it. Also, the famous restaurant transformations that Williams smoothly achieves in the film become a kind of unclimactic afterthought since Daniel's children discover his disguise as Mrs. Doubtfire right before the end of the first act. At the same time, a flamenco number in Michael Jon Slinger's uneven choreography is disappointingly brief.

Still, under the tour direction by Steve Edlund, Smith makes a game effort at capturing the nanny's persuasiveness in making sure that the children do their homework and satisfy their mother's expectations. Smith shares a sweet duet with Alanis Sophia, who makes a solid transition from attitude to affection as older sister Lydia. Sophia displays a strong voice on their penultimate number "Just Pretend." Melissa Campbell has the right sincerity as Miranda.

Daniel speaks of the nanny bringing out the best in him. So it goes for Williams' portrayal and the appealing film itself. Although many audience members felt this way opening night at the Emerson Colonial Theatre, for this critic—and perhaps many fans of the original effort—the creators of the musical "Mrs. Doubtfire" needed to parent their collaboration with greater care.

commitment to accessible homeownership. The cooperative's resilience and community impact were formally recognized when Mayor Michelle Wu presented a proclamation to the organization on August 30.

The MMCC Board of Directors accepted the mayoral proclamation during the cooperative's Annual Community Cookout, a neighborhood tradition that reflects the organization's deep community roots.

"MMCC is very proud to continue to be a Village of Impact in the South End Community," said a board representative. "We have been since the beginning, and will always be a staple in the community, representing affordable ownership in Boston's South End."

As housing costs continue to rise throughout Boston, Methunion Manor stands as a testament to the power of cooperative ownership in preserving affordable housing options for working families in one of the city's most sought-after neighborhoods.

The cooperative's four-decade journey from its origins as a minority-led housing initiative to its current status as a cornerstone of South End affordable housing demonstrates the lasting impact of community-driven solutions to urban housing challenges.
