Is the new musical "The Queen of Versailles" an ambitious if as yet overlong work-in-progress? Based on the 2012 Lauren Greenfield documentary film of the same and the life stories of Jackie and David Siegel, the Stephen Schwartz (music and lyrics)-Lindsey Ferrentino (book) show looks to focus on the ups and downs of building the title Florida replica of the famed Louis XIV Palace of Versailles.

Notwithstanding Tony Award-winning and nominated talent, this Broadway-bound effort seems as challenged in its own way as the community for the past 11 years to expand access and opportunity for urban youth, with sports programs providing an entry point to education, career, and health resources.

"The BASE is thrilled to be part of this exciting new initiative of the Atrius Health Equity Foundation," said Steph Lewis, President & CEO, The BASE. "With this funding, we will expand our work in nutrition education, mental health, leadership development, and more. As a result, our young people will be empowered to lead healthier lives and gain the knowledge and resources to be change agents in our communities. We believe this initiative is going to create intergenerational impact in Boston."

Boston Community Pediatrics, which is the first nonprofit private pediatric practice of its kind in Massachusetts, will be supporting The BASE in the delivery of the programs. Closely located to each other in the center of Boston, the two organizations have collaborated since 2021 and will be working together closely in the implementation of the AHEF grant.

"It is a privilege to partner with the BASE in this meaningful work," said Robyn Riseberg, Founder, Boston Community Pediatrics. "By providing healthcare, mental health care, and health education within the Roxbury community, we are establishing relationships with teens and families in their own environment, which is crucial for building long-term trust, wellness, and understanding. BCP is excited and proud to collaborate with The BASE in this effort."

Established in 2022 as an independent organization, the Atrius Health Equity Foundation carries forward Atrius Health's historic focus on improving health outcomes for all. The Atrius Health Equity Foundation aims to close life expectancy gaps across Eastern Massachusetts by offering funding responsive to community priorities and that centers community leadership and collaboration.

"The Atrius Health Equity Foundation heard directly from community leaders in 2023 that economic mobility, educational opportunity, and youth as a population of focus are important to close the life expectancy gap. As a result of this community engagement and the Foundation's belief that we must all come together to ensure everyone in Eastern Massachusetts lives a longer, healthier life, we created the Youth as Health Care Change Agents grant program," said Dr. Ann Hwang, President of the Atrius Health Equity Foundation. "These efforts recognize organizations for their deep roots in the communities served and collaborative approach and drive forward our vision for youth as powerful agents of change."

The BASE is among eight awardees selected through a highly competitive and rigorous selection process shaped by community input.

future of education, by collaborating and amplifying the mission and goals of City Year in the Greater Boston area," said Smith-Attuquayefio. "As a STEM advocate and the daughter of a nearly 30-year educator, I care deeply about education, resources for our students and inspiring the next generation of STEM professionals."

Smith-Attuquayefio also serves as President of The National Society of Black Engineers Boston Professionals, a leading Boston-based organization dedicated to the academic and professional success of Black and African American engineering students and professionals.

Prior to joining Bain Capital as a Partner, Todd Markson was CSO & COO at Cengage, where he led strategy, corporate development, channel, pricing, procurement and supply chain. Before Cengage, Todd was a management strategy consultant in London, Dubai and Boston, most recently as a Senior Principal in the Technology and Private Equity practices of BCG. Earlier in his career, Markson was a technology entrepreneur in Silicon Valley, co-founding and successfully exiting education technology and information services companies.

"I have been engaged throughout my life with charities and organizations that provide opportunities for children from historically underrepresented and economically constrained backgrounds," said Markson. "As I was thinking about joining a non-profit board, I wanted an organization focusing on children's education that had both a local and national footprint, and City Year was a clear fit. Given Bain Capital's long history with City Year, I was excited to continue the tradition and deepen the partnership."

Markson received an MBA with honors from the University of Michigan and a BA in Political Science from Brown University. Following graduation, he spent two years as a teacher in Mali, West Africa with the Peace Corps, leading numerous micro-finance initiatives in communities in the Sahara Desert.

kids between the ages of 5-13 about the power of entrepreneurship, leadership, and collaboration as they create and sell their own handmade items to the public in the South End neighborhood.

The program was introduced by Kaiti Coffin, Director of Youth and Family Mobility Programming at USES, and developed with her colleagues Breana Morgan and Elizabeth Sherr. "I saw other programs create this neat learning experience for their kids where mathematics, creativity, and business skills were taught together in a fun way. So I thought, how could we make this fit into our two week summer programming sessions?"

The process starts with each classroom in the club48 program tasked with creating a business idea and a product to sell at the Entrepreneurs Market. The students have one week to name their business, determine what they want to sell, pick a selling price, and figure out how much one item costs to create. Each classroom then presents its concept to an adult panel, made up of USES staff and a USES Board member or volunteer. At the end of their presentation, the students are expected to ask for a loan. Approval rates are always in the kids' favor—not once has a business loan been denied.

During their second and final week, the students focus on making posters, putting up neighborhood flyers and creating their items to sell at the upcoming market, which typically occurs at the end of their second week. "The kids usually want to make different types of jewelry or keychains or some sort of food item like snow cones," says Coffin. "It's great when they choose something easy enough that they can make ahead of time. One year, we had a younger group who wanted to make dream catchers and they ended up being so complicated to make that the adults had to come in and make them with the kids."

On the day of the market, kids set up their vendors in the USES courtyard and figure out who will be running each cash register and helping customers. With the Entrepreneurs Market open to the public, students get to learn about direct communication, respect, and service in real time with people they have never met.

"They learn so much through this market—not only how to create a business, sell items, and repay a loan, but they learn how to get in front of people, present ideas, and how to answer questions on the fly," Coffin shares.

As the final piece to the project, the kids determine if they can repay their loans and if there are any funds leftover which they can use to celebrate their hard work. Now in its third year, the kids once again landed in the green. Students chose to celebrate with a pizza, chicken, and fries party in two classrooms. Another classroom chose a movie day with popcorn and candy, and another decided to celebrate with Happy Meals and a new game for their class.

Coffin hopes that USES will continue the Entrepreneurs Market in their summer programming for years to come. "This market provides an opportunity for different students to shine in different areas. All the students are met with challenges and it's very cool to see how each student shines every year."

ily home.

Thanks to a lively Schwartz opener “Because We Can,” the construction of this visually striking musical promises a high-powered examination of the project and the goals of the Siegels. That promise also informs the work of the strong design team. Here and throughout, scenic and video designer Dane Laffrey captures the busy opulence—for example, three exquisite chandeliers and wall-covering framed paintings evoking Versailles era figures—and the scope and size of the replica.

Christian Cowan’s vivid costumes range from flashy, often bling-adorned outfits for Jackie to casual wear for her unassuming daughter Victoria and adopted niece Jonquil. Natasha Katz’s sharp lighting catches the hyped up grandeur of the replica and the intimacy of some family scenes.

Equally auspicious—under Michael Arden’s careful direction—is the presence of celebrated actors as the leads. Opening night theatergoers rightly cheered the first appearances of Kristin Chenoweth and F. Murray Abraham. Chenoweth—a wide ranging actress (seen by this critic in her very deserving Tony Award performance in “You’re a Good Man, Charlie Brown” and nominated one in “Wicked”) brings commanding authority and charisma to the title role as Jackie moves from being crowned the 1993 Mrs. Florida to marrying Jewish time-shares resort firm power David (of Westgate Resorts Ltd. Fame) in 2000 and often appearing to take charge of the palatial project. She brings booming confidence to the hopefulness of “Caviar Dreams” and appealing lightness to an early second act duet with Cassandra Jones as Marie Antoinette.

Abraham (memorable as Shylock in a 2011 tour of a “Merchant of Venice” revival and the second season of “The White Lotus”) has the right business savvy as David and deep caring for Jackie. While David is relatively supporting here as in the documentary, Abraham does make the most of his narrative ‘singing’ in the jaunty country western style “The Ballad of the Time

Share King.”

While Abraham and especially Chenoweth keep the story going, there are two particularly glaring elements in need of work—Ferrentino’s fairly uninvolved book and Lauren Yalango-Grant and Christopher Cree Grant’s unsatisfying choreography. Ferrentino needs to make Jackie’s rocky relationship with her troubled daughter Victoria more moving.

Many audience members may find that Victoria’s death and the Siegel’s establishment of the Victoria’s Voice Foundation to combat drug overdosing need more emotional power in the musical’s book. At the same time, there is very little attention to the couple’s other children—for instance, very brief attention to their twins.

While Melody Butiu brings compelling feeling to insightful housekeeper-confidante Sofia, there ought to be an actual number in which she can express her disappointments with Jackie as a frequently absentee parent. Also, Ferrentino’s book seems to give short shrift to David’s alarming dismissal of virtually his entire timeshare staff during the 2008 Great Recession.

More time should also be given to the musical’s choreography. A waltz of the Siegels ends far too soon. A soft shoe stretch for their sweet “Trust Me” should be longer as well. The same can be said for a clever minuet that brings together Louis XIV and Jackie. Here too the sequence ends too abruptly. Compensating at times is Pablo David Laucerica’s spirit and flair as the Sun King.

Other compensations in the as yet uneven show include two strong supporting performances—Tatum Grace Hopkins’ affecting Jonquil and especially Nina White’s arrestingly vulnerable Victoria. Hopkins and White share an appealing duet on “Pavane for a Dead Lizard.” White delivers Victoria’s touching lament “Pretty Always Wins” and her blunt observations in “The Book of Random” with the kind of power that should bring her Tony nomination attention.

Jackie Siegel speaks of American royalty, an idea that can fit Abraham and Chenoweth. Even so, “Queen of Versailles”—with an overlong first act and a somewhat overbearing title character—has a ways to go to be crowned.
