FKR & BLM Have Much In Common

Justice Concerns Could Unite Unlikely Allies

They emerge from different communities, with different backgrounds and political leanings. Yet these two American movements share striking similarities in their core grievances.

Both distrust official narratives from law enforcement. Both point to evidence they believe has been tampered with or mishandled. Both suspect investigations have been designed to protect insiders rather than uncover truth. Both question whether institutions can legitimately investigate themselves. Both have built grassroots communities through social media, 19th through Friday May 23rd, 7 a.m.-11:30 a.m., owner Jay Hajj will turn back the price of Mike's popular "Weekday Special" to $6.99. That's 3 eggs any style, 3 pieces bacon or sausage, grits or home fries, toast and coffee.

In 1995, Bill Clinton was President, Thomas Menino was Mayor of Boston, OJ Simpson went on trial, the Internet became ubiquitous, and Jay Hajj opened Mike's City Diner. Since opening, every Boston mayor from Menino to Marty Walsh, and now Michelle Wu, has frequented the diner for breakfast meetings with the city's top officials — imagine if the walls could talk!

From the beginning, Mike's City Diner was a community gathering space and neighborhood mainstay, a favorite for police, firefighters, and doctors at nearby Boston Medical Center. Whoever you were—black, white, rich, poor, gay, straight—you were welcome. Since then, Mike's City Diner has ingrained itself in the community and given back to the people he credits for the diner's decades of success.

Hajj represents the American dream—moving to Boston from war torn Lebanon as a child and becoming a force in the city's vibrant restaurant and real estate communities. He helped spearhead the renovation of legendary Locke-Ober into trendy Yvonne's (Mariel, Mr. H), and also rents the space for Toro tapas bar (located right next door to

He is a frequent guest on the Food Network, where you can see him alongside Guy Fieri on "Guy's Big Bite," "Diners, Drive-Ins and Dives" and "Guy's Grocery Games." In 2014, The Food Network named Mike's Famous Pilgrim Sandwich as one of the Five Best Thanksgiving meals in America.

"When I think of Boston I think of the tea party, I think of the Sox of course, and now I think of a place called Mike's City Diner!" Says Guy Fieri.

ments and drive measurable growth in children's learning, making her a perfect fit for Ellis. We are thrilled to welcome Rosa into this new role during a period of growth at Ellis."

Turco will drive the creation of a measurement, evaluation and learning system to measure the impact of Ellis's new Center of Excellence, ensuring continuous improvement and data-driven decision-making. She will develop systems and processes that assess teacher quality, child outcomes and the broader classroom environment, recognizing that early learning is shaped by multiple, interconnected factors.

By integrating diverse data sources – ranging from child assessments to observations of instructional practices, family engagement and social-emotional supports – Turco will create a sustainable framework that not only measures growth but also helps educators, families and policymakers understand the everyday impact of early childhood education. This work will be deeply aligned with Ellis's mission of helping all children develop the social, emotional and academic skills they need to thrive in school and in life.

Turco brings over a decade of experience as an education researcher, specializing in early childhood education and literacy. Before joining Ellis, she was the Director of Research at National University and Director of Research and Evaluation at a software development organization dedicated to improving the quality of life for underserved communities. Turco was also a teaching fellow at the Harvard University Graduate School of Education for nearly five years. In her most recent roles, she spearheaded the development of a bilingual e-reading platform and designed and evaluated language and social-emotional learning programs.

Turco's research spans executive function and theory of mind in bilingual preschoolers, infants' early numerical intuitions and the impact of digital media on early language and literacy development. Across these areas, her work seeks to identify the optimal ways to support young children and to capture the key features of learning environments that best foster growth for children from diverse backgrounds and needs.

Turco also holds a master's degree in education from the Harvard Graduate School of Education and a bachelor's degree in psychology from Wellesley College.

A Medway resident, Rosa is immersed in early childhood at Ellis and at home, which she shares with her husband and two young children, ages 1 and 3.

In remembrance of Barbara Francis Agbay Cherubini, May 14, 1939 - March 1, 2025

Barbara Francis Cherubini, a beloved mother, wife, sister, friend, entrepreneur, and philanthropist, passed away peacefully and surrounded by an adoring family at her home in Florida on March 1, 2025, after a remarkable demonstration of endurance and strength in her fight against Parkinson's Disease. Barbara was the embodiment of style and grace, and will be forever missed.

ors and in growing AllMed, she created a home where family came first, just as her mother and grandmother had done before her. Through the unconditional love and support Barbara provided to Alexandra and Nicole, she passed on her work ethic, entrepreneurial spirit, fashion sense, sewing lessons, and food infused with love and joy. She taught them both to truly savor their lives offered, seeking pleasure in all they chose to do.

Barbara was born in Worcester, Massachusetts, to Albert and Nancy Agbay, and grew up in a home filled with warmth, love, and the comforting smells of Italian and Lebanese cooking. She was the cherished sister to Judy and Albert. Their home was always full of family, friends, afternoon coffees, and beautiful dresses, all made by her mother. Barbara's beloved grandmother, Giulia, was a guiding influence for Barbara, instilling in her a deep sense of family values, a tireless work ethic, and a passion for feeding and caring for others; all of which Barbara adopted and carried throughout her life.

Barbara lived life to the fullest. She loved to host parties, spend meaningful time with family and friends, and took many memorable trips. Travel was one of her greatest joys, and of all the places she visited, Morocco, its incredible history of craft and its exceptional cuisine held a special place in her heart. She deeply enjoyed the arts, a passion she passed on to her grandchildren, Malachi and Roma, who have both pursued and excelled in this arena.

Barbara's path to success began when she attended Catholic school followed by Regis College, where she obtained her degree in Home Economics and forged lasting friendships. With her strong nose and taste and entrepreneurial spirit, Barbara worked together with perfumist Arthur D. Little to create Wink, the original version of Fresca.

Her love of fashion was constantly on display, and she forever looked fabulous curating elegant and timeless ensembles. Barbara loved boxing and ballroom dancing, taking lessons well into the late stages of her life. After receiving her Parkinson's diagnosis in the early 2000s, Barbara continued on with her infectious joy for life, never letting the disease define her. Instead, she became a dedicated supporter of the Michael J. Fox Foundation and their remarkable efforts to find a cure for Parkinson's. In addition Barbara founded the Barbara and Julian Cherubini Foundation, which among other causes has focused on neurological research and advancement through the Fox Foundation and Massachusetts General Hospital. Barbara's resilience, kindness, and generosity of spirit remained unwavering. She was forever a beacon of love and strength, always ready to offer help to those in need.

On an evening out with her girlfriends at Pete's Pub in Boston, Barbara met her husband and the love of her life, Julian. They were a perfect match in every sense, marrying six months after meeting. Together they created a lasting legacy and loving family. After moving to the South End, they made life-long friends and developed an interest in real estate, which became a lifelong passion for the two of them. Julian and Barbara were ever the complement to one another, particularly in their joint work in founding AllMed, a company born from their shared vision to "help people help people" in 1970. While Julian leveraged his multiple degrees to rethink ways in which to address the needs of caregivers and patients, Barbara implemented a family-business mindset and spent many late nights stuffing envelopes with mailers and stitching tabs onto knee braces. After growth in their business moved the company out of their living room and into a downstairs office in the South End, AllMed continued to grow with the ongoing dedication and devotion from Julian and Barbara, and ultimately moved to Dedham, employing over 200 individuals.

Barbara is survived by her daughters, Alexandra and Nicole Agbay Cherubini, her grandchildren, Malachi Bosch and Roma Josephine Cherubini Purcell, and her son-in-law, Camilo Alvarez. Her legacy of love, joy, and determination will live on in all who were fortunate enough to have had their lives enriched by knowing her. She will forever be remembered as a woman of style, grace, brilliance, determination, and extraordinary strength, and she will be deeply missed by all who had the privilege of sharing in her remarkable life.

Together, Julian and Barbara raised their beloved daughters, Nicole and Alexandra. As a mother, Barbara was a constant source of love, support, and guidance. While continuing to work with Julian in their real estate endeavor

A party in celebration of Barbara's life will be held in Boston on Sunday, June 8th, 2025. For more information, please contact cherubinimemorial@gmail.com.

In lieu of flowers, gifts may be made to The Michael J. Fox Foundation in memory of Barbara Cherubini. Donations can be sent to The Michael J. Fox Foundation for Parkinson's Research at 111 West 33rd Street, 10th Floor, New York, NY 10001, or via michaeljfox.org/donate.

recognize their common ground. Yet supporters of Karen Read and Black Lives Matter activists often view each other as occupying opposite ends of America's divided landscape.

At first glance, these groups might seem worlds apart. But dig deeper, and you'll find their core concerns spring from the same well: distrust of law enforcement and fears about systemic justice failures.

The Karen Read case has captivated Massachusetts and beyond since Boston police officer John O'Keefe was found dead in 2022. His girlfriend, Karen Read, is charged with second-degree murder, leaving the scene of a deadly accident, and manslaughter after allegedly striking O'Keefe with her vehicle. She has pleaded not guilty, claiming she is the victim of a law enforcement conspiracy. Her previous trial ended with a hung jury and her re-trial is underway.

Read's supporters argue she's been railroaded by a corrupt system protecting its own.

They allege that there is missing evidence, inconsistent testimonies, and investigation irregularities that suggest a cover-up.

Sound familiar? These are precisely the concerns that galvanized the Black Lives Matter movement: allegations of evidence tampering, officers protecting each other, and investigations that seem designed to reach predetermined conclusions rather than uncover truth.

Both movements fundamentally question whether our justice system can fairly investigate itself. When police investigate potential misconduct by fellow officers – whether in a suspicious death case like Read's or in police violence cases central to BLM – the same troubling question emerges: Who watches the watchers?

Critics may dismiss Read supporters as conspiracy theorists or BLM activists as anti-police, but this misses their shared, legitimate concern: justice systems work only when accountability applies equally to everyone, including those within the system.

The parallels don't stop at critiques. Both movements have leveraged social media to circumvent traditional information gatekeepers, building grassroots communities united by skepticism toward official narratives. Both have faced dismissal from authorities who seem more interested in discrediting their concerns than addressing them.

Of course, significant differences exist between these movements in scale, demographics, and historical context. But their common thread – demanding transparency when power investigates itself – transcends political divides.

Perhaps there's an opportunity here. If Americans from different political backgrounds can recognize their shared interest in accountable institutions, we might find common ground in reforming systems to restore trust.

Because ultimately, a justice system that works fairly for everyone benefits us all – regardless of which specific case brought us to that realization.

Portmanteau

matist has tapped into her own background as well as her family's in nine plays being staged locally through next year – beginning with "Sojourners" and "The Grove," already handsomely produced by Huntington Theatre. The fourth play in the cycle – "Her Portmanteau" (the third "runboyrn" has been heard on a podcast) – is receiving a strong co-production by Central Square Theater and the Front Porch Arts Collective.

Although each of the plays in the cycle can be regarded as individual efforts, "Her Portmanteau" absorbingly develops the stories of characters first introduced in "Sojourners" and "The Grove." As with Udofo's own family, the Ufots immigrate to Houston, Texas in the 1970's (1978 in the first play) and move to Worcester in the second (here in 2009). Centering on family reunion, confrontation and possible reconciliation, "Her Portmanteau" brings together conflicted mother Abasiama Ufof and her two very different daughters with different fathers – gay New York-based Adiaha (meaning eldest in the Nigerian language Ibibio) and Nigeria-raised Iniabasi Ekpeyong. Iniabasi proves the pivotal character as her visit at Adiaha's homey apartment (well detailed and colorfully set by designer Shelley Barish) becomes a war of words with seething resentments involving the half-sisters and their Worcester-based mother.

While "Her Portmanteau" may sometimes seem less vocally showy than its predecessors, Udofo's disarming drama ends up offering timely insights about family understanding and love as well as respect for cultural differences. The plays clever title can have as much to do with Abasiama's emotional baggage as with her mother's connection to the daughter's red suitcase and telling photos she brings on her visit. Abasiama speaks of her own son Kufre – the subject of the fifth play in the cycle "Kufre n' Quay" – expected to be staged this coming July. As in the earlier plays, the characters speak a fair amount of Ibibio – especially in heated exchanges. Some theatergoers may wish that the companies staging Udofo's plays would provide translating surtitles or playbill explanations of the gist of these conversations. Even so – particularly as characters respond in English – audience members are likely to discern the nuances of such exchanges.

Under Tasia A. Jones' thoughtful direction, the play's journey from initial misunderstanding and emotional distance to potential common ground is vividly portrayed by the co-production's talented cast. Jade A. Guerra finds all of Iniabasi's early contentiousness and puzzlement as well as her gradual softening towards her welcoming sister and her conflicted mother. Lorraine Victoria Karyyike captures Adiaha's ongoing outreach to her sister while never losing sight of the character's complicated relationship with her mother. Patrice Jean-Baptiste catches Abasiama's tenacity as well as her vulnerability in searching for full understanding from her daughters. Costume designer Chloe Moore artfully reflects the degrees to which the characters' clothes demonstrate their respective attitudes about American and Nigerian cultural differences.

As with the title suitcase, "Her Portmanteau" could do with a careful examination by the playwright – especially to pack more detail about the sisters' respective challenges regarding work and life. Still, the plays staged thus far from the Ufof Cycle establish Udofo as a significant voice – one that is adding an important measure of excitement to the Boston theater scene.
