Zoning and Development Updates
7 Columbus Ave.: Zoning Board of Appeal hearing in September

There is a proposal for 7 Columbus that PBNA would also oppose pending modifications. In this case the proposal is seeking a variance for a two story 300 square foot addition to the rear of the building which would be supported by piers with a deck above. This proposal does not conform to zoning

Tempest

The magic—under artistic director Steve Maler's inspired guidance—begins right away with the storm that brings the enemies as well as the virtuous few with them to the Duke of Milan's island. Co-lighting designers Eric Southern and Maxime Grano De Oro and sound designer David Reiffel make the conjuring of the shipwreck vividly evocative. Equally evocative are Prospero's machinations with the assistance of elusive spirit Ariel.

As with Puck and his superior Oberon in "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Ariel is visible only to his master—here adorned with a handsome magician's coat from costume designer Nancy Leary. What makes Ariel particularly eye-catching is the casting of gifted Boston Ballet principal John Lam. As the spirit describes his "performing" of the title storm and making sure that all of the ship's passengers reach "safe harbor" as requested by Prospero, Lam moves with greatly expressive arms and nimble legs. Throughout the play as Ariel progresses to his own freedom, the highly graceful dancer will have ballet fans and newcomers looking forward to his work with Boston Ballet as it returns to the Opera House in November with its deservedly renowned "The Nutcracker." CSC has smartly added a melodious trio—Ekemini Ekpo, Jessica Golden and Marta Rymer—in appropriately blue outfits to bring striking harmony to Ariel's "Full fathom five"—beginning song that mentions "sea nymphs—an ensemble that provides sonorous counterpoint.

By contrast, Prospero's coarse nemesis Calaban comes to impressively raw life thanks to the wide-ranging talents of Nael Nacer. Nacer has the right combination of viciousness and vulnerability as the ambitious curser who wishes he could seduce the magician's wholesome daughter Miranda but also suffers from a slave's mindset. Nacer's interaction with Fred Sullivan, Jr. as dangerous if comical would be king Stephano and John Kuntz as his clownish sidekick Trinculo makes for sharp dynamics.

Director Maler smoothly establishes the parallel dynamics involving Prospero's diverse peers. Shakespeare buffs may call to mind the Duke's authority in "Measure for Measure" as Prospero confronts his usurping brother Antonio—played with convincing callousness by Remo Airaldi. Siobhan Juanita Brown is a revelation as the magician's supportive advisor—here Gonzala in gender-bending casting. Richard Noble is fittingly conflicted as King of Naples Alonso, while Maurice Emmanuel Parent effectively understates his brother Sebastian's malice.

Nora Eschenheimer as Miranda and Michael Underhill as Alonso's son Ferdinand provide an arc of lyrical romance that offsets an atmosphere of bitterness and resentments. Eschenheimer is very appealing as Miranda rhapsodizes about a "brave new world." Underhill's Ferdinand displays remarkable support for his love and respect for her father.

Best of all is John Douglas Thompson as Prospero. This is the kind of commanding and complex performance the true Duke of Milan deserves. Thompson persuasively moves from apparent vindictiveness to wise forgiveness. At the same time, he catches Prospero's strong paternal caring for Miranda and his very different evolving approaches to Ariel and Calaban. CSC will do well to keep this amazing actor in mind for other such demanding roles in the Shakespeare canon.

Seven Rooms: The Masque of the Red Death

Flat Earth Theatre, virtual production online through August 15. Pay-what-you-can. Ticket Leap. flatearththeatre.org

Prospero (Juliet Bowler) welcomes you! Photo via Flat Earth Theatre.

BY JULES BECKER

Call "The Masque of the Red Death" uncannily timely. As the COVID-19 Delta Variant continues to spread, Edgar Allan Poe's masterful 1842 story becomes a cautionary tale about a false sense of security among partygoers living in a kind of delusional bubble. Now Flat Earth Theatre has turned this "Masque" into what the inventive company calls "a radically collaborative virtual theater experience." The result does full justice to Poe's vivid gem as well as the scope of online fare.

As in Poe's story, a quirky duke named Prospero (as controlling in his own way as Shakespeare's predecessor of the same name) assures the guests at his castle-like abbey—referred to as "The Manor"—that "You are safe here" and "We shall ride out the Red Death ('pestilence' in "Masque") together." In Poe's story, buffoons, improvisatori, ballet dancers, and musicians entertain the invited knights and dames. Similarly, Flat Earth has gifted regular company actress Juliet Bowler becoming a dynamic hosting duke who promises "something for everyone" in the title seven chambers. Here the color-coded rooms come to life in almost the same order as in the original story: blue, purple, green, orange, white, violet (for Poe, white and violet) and black & red.

In Flat Earth's collaborative conception, seven different playwrights provide the respective rooms' unusual scenarios. Talented aesthetic designer Michael Clark Wonson and sound designer Kyle Lampe capture the hues and haunting effects of the chambers. Cliff Odle's "Blue Room" opener deals with issues of race, identity and justice during a conflict over musical blues. MJ Halberstadt's "Purple Room" sharply dissects the strange behavior of unseen partygoers (even circle jerks checking underwear) through the humorous observations of two coat check workers. A rush of tossed coats may call to mind the coats and bags Miranda Priestly drops on Andrea's desk in "The Devil Wears Prada." Michael Lin's "Green Room" speaks of a rescue craft called Athena and a 'quarantine position.' Questions of survival are crucial here as 700 of the guests are "gone."

At this point Prospero appears to say that "We're in this to the bitter end." A kind of foreshadowing by costume—credit Zane Kealey for Prospero's blingy black outfit—precedes the first of the second trio of rooms—namely the "Orange Room," written by Hortense Gerardo. Here three friends allude to a past year of socially distanced isolation. While they toast repeatedly and employ puppets in a quest for truth and peace of mind, cryptic comments about the spirit of a peer named Moira add to this room's haunted ambience. "Violet Room" by Sari Boren calls for transformation, while "White Room" by Kelly Smith looks at a search for self-acceptance.

The final and defining "Black and Red Room" (in Poe's story a red-lit and black sable-carpeted chamber) by Gabriel Graetz brings forth a mysterious figure who curiously alludes to two protagonists from other Poe stories—Ligeia from the tale of the same name and Fortunato from "The Cask of Amontillado." Tellingly a statement that some theatergoers may connect with the unvaccinated seems to warn "The Red Death does not discriminate."

Audiences are likely to connect with "Seven Rooms" as an ambitious and stunning achievement. All of the casts and individual directors deserve as much praise here as the playwrights. Even so, Bowler gives a tour de force performance as initially overconfident and ultimately vulnerable and humbled Prospero. Michael Lin proves a double threat as a playwright and quick-timing actor in "Purple Room" with equally sharp Kristen Heider. Miles Wheeler II has riveting edginess as the mystery figure of "Black and Red Room."

Poe's haunting tale evokes a rich tableau of inevitability. By contrast, Flat Theatre's "Seven Rooms" should lead to human change even as it entertains.
