

Board rejects replacing an LGBTQ sports bar in the South End with a marijuana shop

On October 31, the Zoning Board of Appeal today rejected a plan to replace Cathedral Station, 1222

Washington St. in the South End, with a marijuana dispensary.

But that doesn't necessarily mean one of the city's few remaining LGBTQ-focused bars will stay open. Michael Ross, attorney for would-be dispensary operator Nike John, said his client didn't force Cathedral Station out; its owner wanted to retire. In chat for the Zoom hearing,

Boston's Urban Wilds Program joins the Forests in Cities Network

SUBMITTED BY BOSTON PARKS AND RECREATION DEPARTMENT

The Boston Parks and Recreation Department has announced that the department's Urban Wilds Program, in collaboration with Mass Audubon and Boston University, has been selected to represent Boston in the Forests in Cities Network, a national network dedicated to promoting and advancing healthy forested natural areas in cities across America through science, management, partnerships, and communications.

Boston's Urban Wilds Program manages 31 natural areas across the city. These open spaces offer a peaceful break from Boston's urban environment, serve as outdoor classrooms for children and adults to learn about nature, and provide habitat for native plants and animals. Although Urban Wilds are passive spaces, they require active management to reach their potential. Many of these management challenges encompass a wide range of issues, such as ecology, safety, engineering, public accessibility, education, and environmental justice.

"Our Urban Wilds team will greatly benefit from this new partnership as they continue their work in Boston's forested natural areas, including the urban wilds at Allendale Woods and Sherrin Woods. Additionally, participating in the Network will further enable Urban Wilds staff to help sustainably manage the many parks with forested natural areas, such as Franklin Park," noted Boston Parks Commissioner Ryan Woods. "The work of the Urban Wilds team is complex and requires keeping up with constantly evolving science and best practices. By collaborating with other cities, we will be able to be at the cutting edge of managing these valuable resources."

The Forests in Cities Network was started in 2019 by the Natural Areas Conservancy. The program's goals are to nurture and grow a national network of experts, advance urban forest science and practice, and advocate for increased resources and support. The Network is made up of teams representing varied cities around the U.S. A typical team is made up of a government partner, an academic partner, and a non-profit partner. Teams around the country perform similar work and can share valuable information, experiences, and lessons learned. They also collaborate on large-scale research projects demonstrating the values of urban forested natural areas, furthering each city's ability to advocate for forest protection and sustainable management practices. Not only will Boston show its long history of land protection, but it will also benefit from learning about the land management practices of other cities.

The City's Urban Wilds Program has several core mission functions: it protects urban wilds and other natural areas from threats such as development, encroachment, and other uses that may harm their natural character; it manages and maintains urban wilds and other natural areas to preserve their ecological value; it promotes conservation, passive recreation, environmental education, and other similar uses; it develops administrative, fiscal, and programmatic resources to ensure ongoing, long-term maintenance and management; and it advocates for the long-term protection and stewardship of other urban wilds and natural areas that are not currently owned by the City.

"Our staff identified this as an excellent opportunity for Urban Wilds and our community partners back in the winter of 2021-2022," noted Paul Sutton, Boston's Urban Wilds director. "We quickly began to make a plan for creating a team and applying for membership when we felt ready. Boston's membership in this working group will allow collaboration with forested natural area practitioners nationwide to elevate our work and make it more accessible and beneficial to residents."

Boston's Urban Wilds Program manages 31 natural areas across the city. These open spaces offer a peaceful break from Boston's urban environment, serve as outdoor classrooms for children and adults to learn about nature, and provide habitat for native plants and animals.

Road Trip

young Maryland niece named L'il Bit and her middle-aged uncle by marriage named Peck, the ASP's haunting staging proves as well-steered as an earlier edition at American Repertory Theatre featuring Debra Winger and husband Arliss Howard.

In Vogel's purposely out of chronological order drama—with flashbacks and flash forwards, grownup L'il Bit looks back reflectively at her troubling driver's lessons with Peck. Inspired by Vladimir Nabokov's controversial novel "Lolita"—in which Humbert Humbert molests the title adolescent—yet determined to find actual sympathetic facets of the pedophile alcoholic uncle, Vogel has the emotionally conflicted niece credit him with teaching her how to be safe on the road and experience freedom when she drives.

While she never loses sight of Peck's very real sexual abusiveness—in her pre-adolescence at age 11 and throughout her teenage years, L'il Bit does recall her uncle being the only family member to support her dream of going to college. Although Vogel includes a chilling scene in which Peck gives L'il Bit's unseen cousin Bobby a fishing lesson that veers to probable sexual abuse on a treehouse, she does have his niece consider the possibility that her uncle may have been abused himself as a youth.

The complexity of L'il Bit's memories and the effect of her experiences on her own development as a woman make the audience's journey as challenging in its own way as her own. In fact, Vogel has admitted that she wanted "to get the audience to go along for a ride they wouldn't ordinarily take or even know they're taking." To that end, her chronology-defying drama (one that Pinter buffs may see having an affinity with the British playwright's structurally similar "Betrayal") has L'il Bit recall being expelled from college with her own drinking problem in 1968, refusing to dance at a sock hop in 1966, being photographed fairly provocatively by her uncle in 1965 and agreeing naively to once a week driving lessons in 1964 providing Peck does not "cross the line."

Vogel's richly balanced play does show L'il Bit's family often crossing the line in their own ways. Her misogynistic grandfather resorts to insults and putdowns. For her part, her grandmother does not believe in female orgasms. Still, L'il Bit's mother does advise her wisely about not mixing drinks and never leaving them unattended.

Disturbing family dysfunction aside, nothing is unattended in director Vaan Hogue's sharp pacing of a very strong cast. Jennifer Rohn brilliantly captures all of L'il Bit's vulnerability and growing insightfulness about her uncle's manipulative driving instruction. Never turning the growing pains-ridden niece into a victim, Rohn does bring convincing fury to her pushback against Peck as he insists that he is in love with her.

Trainor, Jr. finds all of Peck's dangerous elusiveness and pernicious charm. His seductive fishing lesson with unseen Bobby is as scary as Howard's in the memorable earlier A.R.T. effort. Amy Griffin, Sarah Newhouse and Tommy Vines as a very different modern day Greek chorus find all of the alternately humorous and questionable observation of family members—with Newhouse a riveting standout as she tries to advise L'il Bit about life and relationships.

For several decades, professor Vogel listened to students crying in her office about their own experiences. "How I Learned to Drive" remains both a timely warning and an affecting guide for adolescents and adults alike. ASP's riveting revival is as road ready as grownup L'il Bit.

though, Jeremy Cattani, who has worked at the bar since 2014, called that "misrepresentation" and said it's a rumor that John and Ross made up.

Following a long hearing, the board initially voted 4-3 to approve John's proposed Boston Garden dispensary, but zoning votes require at least five votes, so the vote lost. On a second motion, the board then voted 5-2 to reject her plans without prejudice - which means she can re-apply for the conditional-use permit she needs within a year. Or she could sue in Suffolk Superior Court to seek to "annul" the vote.

Board members Norm Stemberge, Katie Whewell, Jeanne Pinado and Dave Collins initially voted in favor, while Gio Valencia, David Aiken and Chairwoman Sherry Dong voted against. On the second vote, to deny, Stemberge, Valencia, Collins, Aiken and Dong voted yes, Whewell and Pinado voted no.

The hearing brought opposition from both elected officials and residents on several fronts: The pot shop would replace a beloved "safe space" for the LGBTQ community at a time when it is increasingly under attack across the country, it would provide too much of an enticement for all the kids who congregate at Peters Park and all the addicts at Mass and Cass and Pine Street Inn, and would put both kids in nearby daycares and people going to the SOWA market at risk.

"The loss of another center of our culture would be tragic," state Rep. John Moran (D-9th), who is gay, said. He called the location, across Washington Street from the park and near several schools and daycare centers "very troubling" and added that what really "sickens me" is what he said was evidence that John wants to get approval for the shop and then sell it for as much as $5 million. "That is not the intent of the equity program," he said, referring to the preferential treatment John gets in the process for marijuana licenses because she is Black.

Through aides, City Councilors Ed Flynn (South End, South Boston, Chinatown, downtown) and Michael Flaherty (at large) also opposed the dispensary request.

Residents voiced similar concerns. Raul Gonzalez, who lives on West Dedham Street, echoed Moran's comments and noted all the LGBTQ venues that have closed in recent years, including Machine in the Fenway and the Eagle in the South End.

South End resident and developer Mario Nicosia, who helped coin the name SOWA, said that in his six decades of going to community meetings, "I've never seen the neighborhood so in sync against something" as it is against the dispensary.

"Even the dogs at Peters Park took a vote and they don't want this," he said.

One resident, Jennifer Grella of Harrison Avenue, who has lived in the neighborhood since 1988, did support the proposal, saying John had proven to be a serious business operator who would clean up the property and surrounding block. She said the concerns about schools and Mass and Cass, when there's already another dispensary even closer to that area, are nothing but "NIMBYism at its worse."

Ross said it's hardly his client's fault that the bar's owner wants to retire - or her responsibility to figure out what to do about that - and that the ward and precinct in which the dispensary would sit overwhelmingly voted in favor of recreational marijuana use in 2016. Of course, he said, the 20 people who opposed it would show up at a hearing on his client's proposal - although the mayor's South End liaison told the board that her office had gotten 100 letters opposed to the proposal and just 7 in favor.

Ross continued that Washington Street is a heavily trafficked road with four travel lanes and two parking lanes, so it's not like it's easy to get to the park and there have been no problems at a dispensary about a half mile from Massachusetts Avenue and Melnea Cass Boulevard. He denied his client is about to sell out, noting she has operated a dispensary in Charlestown for 13 months now. He also denied rumors that she wants to open a cafe where customers could take away, saying that those don't even exist yet, but that she would be amenable to a condition in zoning approval not letting her open such an addition.

Pinato moved to approve the proposal, saying that while she understands the opposition, the board typically defers to the Boston Cannabis Board, which approved the proposal earlier this year. Whewell said she was voting strictly on zoning issues and she saw no reasons that would merit denying a conditional-use permit. Valencia, however, after noting the board has approved most cannabis applications, said he could not support this one because of the location across the street from a park and the concerns about the loss of Cathedral Station.

What's Coming Next

BY JUDAH LEBLANG
Contributing Writer

I'm sitting in a writing class, trying to concentrate on my writing assignment when the text pops up from my mother's care manager on my phone: "Your mother is down to 79.2 pounds this morning." Suddenly I'm back in Cleveland in mind and body, picturing her—or trying to—this skeletal version of the woman I'd last seen in August. Back then, she was at a new low of 87. Now, in the space of just two weeks, the bottom had dropped out, and she had lost another 8 pounds, ten percent of her body weight.

I text the care manager and my brother in Florida, call my mother in assisted living and beg her to eat, hear her say she has no appetite, "I'm just not hungry." As adrenaline surges through my body, I call her care manager, tell her we have to do something, but we are running out of options.

We will try medical marijuana, a last desperate step, while I sign her up for hospice. Sitting in that class, and trying to form words on the page,

I write:

*I am pushing her uphill like Sisyphus
Keep her breathing, eating, body in motion
But gravity takes its toll
And soon she will be weightless
Lighter than air*

Two days later I'm in Cleveland, steeling myself for this new version of my Mom. Though my mother has a touch of dementia and almost no short-term memory, we discussed the idea of hospice on the phone before I came in, and now, this weekend we're due to meet the intake nurse and the care team—nurse, social worker, and chaplain—who will be taking care of her.

The meetings are less depressing, more hopeful than I expected. Their focus is on quality of life rather than quantity; my mother can avoid trips to the hospital emergency room, where the assisted living nurses sent her in the past, where she would wait in purgatory for the hospital doctors to admit her or send her back home after six or eight hours.

My mother is lucid, and follows the gist of the conversations, if not the details. The intake nurse asks about funeral arrangements, “Will she be buried or cremated?”

Later, when I ask my mother if she understood the conversations and the process of signing up for hospice, she replies, “Sort of.”

“These are difficult questions, it’s hard to talk about this,” I say.

“She was just being practical, it’s going to happen,” and I know in that moment, that my mother got it, that she knows what’s coming next.

I’ve been my mother’s long-distance caregiver for 15 years, have watched the slow, steady decline: a broken femur and months of rehab, the ruptured appendix along with the anesthesia that took her memory, the weight loss and gradual wasting along with the isolation of the Covid pandemic.

Ten years ago, when my mother grudgingly moved from her townhouse to assisted living, she bounced back, going to book clubs, attending musical programs, and eating with her tablemates in the dining room. She gained 20 pounds, and six months after moving in, told me that living at Wiggins Place was so much better than living alone.

My mother bounced back from her broken femur, from pneumonia, from a series of medical events, but even she, all five-feet and iron-willed, could only bounce for so long.

Today, my life centers around my phone, around texts, emails, crises that come on a daily basis. I manage moment to moment, getting her the best care that I can.

And yet I can’t change the outcome, and can’t rewrite what’s coming next.

This multi-purpose space will be the heart of the work of IBA and will honor and carry on the purposeful philanthropic legacy of Jean and Tom Yawkey to advance underserved communities, in honor of the Yawkey Foundation's many years of support of IBA.

"The Latinx population is one of the fastest growing demographic groups in Massachusetts, and La CASA will have a transformative community impact by providing a home to inspire young leaders and bring arts and culture to life," said Aixa Beauchamp and Thomas Meléndez, La CASA campaign's co-chairs. "We're thankful for this significant investment from the Yawkey Foundation, which will be critical in making our vision for La CASA a reality."

The open, two-story multi-purpose room will allow for large community events and meetings. The space, which is connected to the adjacent amphitheater and O'Day Playground, will create further activation in the South End community of Villa Victoria. Additionally, it will be a community asset serving Greater Boston as a much-needed addition for affordable arts and community gathering space.

"Yawkey Foundation has supported IBA for more than 15 years, because our Trustees have seen the impact of its vibrant, inclusive artistic programs and dedication to community-building," said Maureen H. Bleday, Yawkey Foundation CEO. "The opportunity to help IBA develop what will be a major hub of Latinx arts and empowerment is truly compelling, and aligns with how the Yawkeys understood the importance of cultural institutions for enriching lives by inspiring curiosity, creativity, and pride."

La CASA, a four-story, 26,000 SF, LEED Silver+, ADA compliant project, will enable IBA to expand its usable space by 65%. Beyond the physical space of the new building, La CASA represents a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity for IBA to enhance and invigorate the arts scene and to create bold new initiatives to address the root causes of inequities and create opportunities for social and economic mobility for families. La CASA will be a place where Greater Boston's Latinx community can thrive: Campaign to Build La CASA

PhD, a senior research scientist at BU's National Emerging Infectious Diseases Laboratories (NEIDL).

Mosquito-borne arboviruses claim over one million human lives each year and are considered a global health priority due to frequent resurgence of activity and unprecedented geographical expansion in recent decades. In the absence of vaccines and targeted treatments, the design of strategies to control arboviruses at the mosquito level is imperative.

According to Saeed, his project is based on the premise that an in-depth understanding of mechanisms by which arboviruses establish lifelong infection in mosquitoes can inspire the design of powerful approaches to reduce viral transmission to humans. He will use an advanced technique, which he recently developed, to investigate the molecular details as to how arboviruses disarm mosquitoes' antiviral defense systems and establish persistent infection.

"These studies will open up new lines of investigation into viral persistence and mosquito biology and facilitate the design of transgenic mosquitoes unable to harbor and transmit infections. It will also accelerate a discovery pipeline that can then be extended to other insect-borne pathogens such as plasmodium and borrelia," said Saeed, who also is an investigator at the NEIDL.

Saeed received his MPhil in microbiology from Quaid-e-Azam University, Pakistan, where he studied the molecular epidemiology of polio-like viruses in patients suffering from paralysis. He then joined the University of Tokyo, receiving his PhD in Pathology, Immunology and Microbiology. During his doctoral studies, he developed novel cell culture systems for the study of hepatitis C virus (HCV) and investigated various aspects of this virus in diverse in vitro and in vivo settings.

Saeed then entered the laboratory of Nobel laureate Charles M. Rice, PhD, at The Rockefeller University, New York, for his postdoctoral training. Although his research in the Rice Lab mainly focused on HCV, he also gained expertise with a number of other positive-strand RNA viruses, including enteroviruses, flaviviruses and alphaviruses. In addition, Saeed developed a novel viral degradomic technique that allows an unbiased identification of cellular proteins cleaved during viral infections.

Saeed joined BU in 2019; his lab explores the role of viral and host proteases in disease mechanisms of positive-strand RNA viruses at the NEIDL. In early 2021 when COVID-19 was declared a global pandemic, his lab pivoted to SARS-CoV-2 research and has since made contributions to the molecular understanding of how SARS-CoV-2 establishes infection in various tissues and interacts with the human innate and adaptive immune systems.

The Richard and Susan Smith Family Foundation created the award in 2017 to fuel creativity and innovation in junior investigators in the basic sciences. It supports the pursuit of high impact ideas to generate breakthroughs and drive new directions in biomedical research. The award funds high-risk, high-reward pilot projects solicited from the brightest junior faculty in the region.
